

homework from hell

More inspiring news from Ohio:

TOLEDO, Ohio (May 12) - A priest was convicted Thursday of murder in the slaying of a nun who was found stabbed 26 years ago in a hospital chapel, her forehead "anointed" with a smudge of blood and her wounds forming an upside-down cross on her chest.

Welcome to the sea of fire my friend, you may now walk the plank. Man...look at this shifty character. Talk about earning your fast-track pass to hell. Also, let us not forget that this murder was committed with "...a sword shaped letter opener..." and that the investigation actually (re)started when Father Scissorhands was accused of a separate crime - molestation (investigation pending). Talk about unresolved issues. This is why I don't trust religious zealots (see below).

At any rate, he's on his way to prison now to serve out his court mandated punishment. Being locked up for 15 years to life is a big deal for sure, but a nun-murdering priest will definitely be privy to a few unique benefits behind bars – like having to deal with all the jailed paranoid schizophrenics that now have voices telling them to shank his antichrist ass with a sharpened bed spring so they can get into heaven. And it's probably deserved of course...and horrible. Even so, we all know that's not as bad as it's going to get for the Catholic Carver from Toledo. He's got a whole afterlife thing to deal with now too.

Not that I believe in it, but I must admit that this story has me curious what hell might look like for a priest that chopped up an associate soldier of God. Assuming for a second that the city of fire has evolved past a red guy with a tail and horns that uses a pitchfork to stir a giant cauldron of simmering souls, and that it is actually custom tailored to the specific evil undertaken in a person's life...I'd say this guy's in trouble. Maybe you true-believers can conjure something up and let me know what's in store for him.
